9 July 1962

Dear Boris:

It is hardly becoming on my part to ask you to forgive me for forgetting to send you a congratulatory cablegram on your birthday, but I do nevertheless ask your pardon. In the press of business and other matters, I just overlooked the date.

At any rate, I did send you a present. Have you received it? I sent it via air mail to Sundsvik, and it should have arrived well in advance of 2 July. The package contained two recently-published books in which I thought you might be interested.

We are all well and getting along nicely, but could be happier if it were not for reasons arising from the fact that B's affairs are still not finally settled and this keeps us all under some tension.

Elizabeth and I do hope that the birthday celebrations came off very well. We wish we could have been with you.

Perhaps we shall be seeing you later in the summer or in autumn. No plans just yet - just hopes.

Love to Annie and you from both of us.

Many happy returns!

Sincerely,

Bill
